“Place Matters” from the PBS documentary series, “Unnatural Causes: Is Inequality Making Us Sick?” will examine how your street address is such a strong predictor of your health. Following the screening, we will have some enlightened discussion related to our influential role in decision-making, policy development and community–building efforts to improve health outcomes.

CONFERENCE OBJECTIVES:

Conference attendees will understand the implications and power inherent in the linkage of health and planning for the built environment of Oklahoma urban places and smaller cities. Attendees will be able to:

- Recognize various evidence-based principles, useful in designing the built environment for active living, and how this can improve cardiovascular conditioning and improve other health outcomes.
- Increase their understanding of the mutual benefit of collaborations between community planners and public health practitioners to improve the built environment in cities across Oklahoma and;
- Learn the basics about healthful design practices, such as Complete Streets, designing for bicycle travel, designing for density, and others; and
- Understand the development review process as it relates to how planning departments’ and health departments’ review private sector plats, zoning, sub-divisions, and site plans and identify practices that may hinder the land development process.
- Gain tools to help citizens advocate for equitable, healthier urban places through coalitions, community forums, and lawmaking and;
- Grasp the value of collaborating on local and state policy and regulation development, as well as in plan implementation, to make a difference in health outcomes.
